In 'Sorry, Pardon, What?', the Tim Wilson Trio presents a collection of exciting original compositions, infused with the spontaneity and interaction of contemporary jazz. Stylistically, the album also draws from a broad range of influences including drum 'n' bass, European classical music, Eastern music, latin grooves and the avant garde.

Being a chordless trio, the group sound is very open, leaving plenty of space for harmonic departures and rhythmic interplay. The structures that bind the compositions and improvisations together are often simple rhythmic concepts or melodic fragments.

Recorded 'live' at Adelpia Studios, the ensemble was able to work in the one acoustic space, and treat the session as per a gig. The objective was for the album to have that raw, edgy quality, that is so often lost in studio jazz recordings.

This release introduces an exciting new trio lineup featuring Dave Beck (drums/percussion) and Ben Robertson (bass), who bring their fresh and exhilarating approaches to these new works.

'Sorry, Pardon What?' is the group's 2nd release. The Trio's first release 'An Element of Logic' received a nomination for an ARIA award in 2001, and was toured nationally in 2002.

Both albums are distributed through Newmarket Music.
